A Letter to God by G.L. Fuentes.
The house — the only one in the entire valley — sat on the crest of a low hill. From this height one could see the river and the field of ripe corn dotted with the flowers that always promised a good harvest.
Lencho — an ox of a man, working like an animal in the fields, but still he knew how to write.

The man went out for no other reason than to have the pleasure of feeling the rain on his body.

These aren't raindrops falling from the sky, they are new coins. The big drops are ten cent pieces and the little ones are fives.

It did not pass quickly. For an hour the hail rained on the house, the garden, the hillside, the cornfield, on the whole valley.
The field was white, as if covered with salt. Not a leaf remained on the trees. The corn was totally destroyed. Lencho's soul was filled with sadness.

To God
The postmaster — a fat, amiable fellow — also broke out laughing...
What faith! I wish I had the faith of the man who wrote this letter. Starting up a correspondence with God!

...but almost immediately he turned serious and, tapping the letter on his desk, commented:

He stuck to his resolution: he asked for money from his employees, he himself gave part of his salary, and several friends of his were obliged to give something 'for an act of charity'.

A letter containing only a single word as a signature: God.

It was impossible for him to gather together the hundred pesos, so he was able to send the farmer only a little more than half.

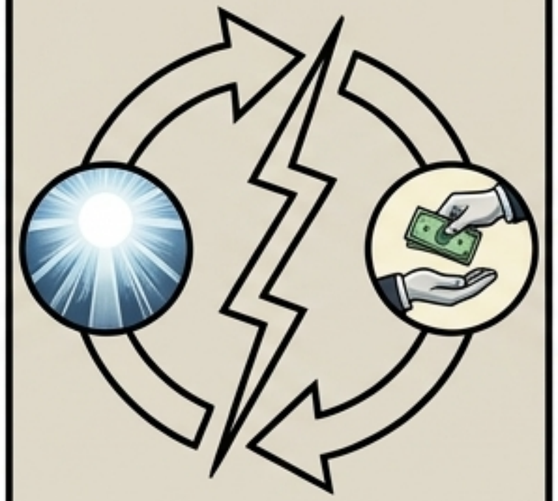
The Dual Conflicts of Lencho's World

Conflict with Nature

Humans vs. Nature. Lencho's livelihood is entirely destroyed by the ruthless hailstorm. He is powerless against the elements.



Conflict with Humans

Humans vs. Humans. Lencho inherently distrusts his fellow men, assuming humans stole the money rather than accepting they might be the source of charity.

Situational Irony: An unexpected aspect of a situation. The post office employees, who are actually Lencho's saviours and benefactors, are ironically accused by him of being a bunch of crooks.
